IT IS GOOD news for us all that the Walt Disney organisation is in trouble. For too long, this enormously rich and powerful business empire, founded by the unlikeable and notoriously right-wing Walt, has exercised a malign influence over almost every child in the world.

Shareholders who have engineered the sacking of the Disney chairman, Michael Eisner, are not in the least bit concerned about such issues. All they are worried about is their dividends. All the more reason why we should 2 the boardroom strife and the possibility of yet further clashes.

We British have particular cause to rejoice, having seen our famous children's classics put into the Disney sausage machine to be made palatable for the American audience. Kipling's Mowgli was turned into a cuddly little kid, Pooh Bear into a folksy old bumbler like Mr Magoo. Any quirks or signs of eccentricity were 3. The Disney feature film is the cultural equivalent of a McDonald's hamburger – reduced to the same old recipe with dollops of sugary sentimentality and just as unpalatable.

4 anything that helps to hasten the end of the Disney monopoly ought to be welcomed by all who are even a little bit concerned about the welfare of the world's children.
